MESSAGE

Dear Aspirants,

The most prestigious, dignified and skilled job profile is desired by almost all the rational youths. But looking at the mean average, figures of past years, it is clear that out of about a Million students applying for the Civil Services Examination, little less than a thousand end up getting selected for the coveted posts. Given the complexity and the vastness of UPSC syllabus, and the nature of competition, the journey is indeed a rigorous one, which poses tremendous challenges to each aspirant draining him/her physically and emotionally, when a good guide can surely help you pass easily through this phase and you can emerge victorious in this battle of talent and endurance.

“You can not cross the sea merely by standing and staring at the water.” Be it the most coveted post or the easiest exam, journey always begins from scratch. With your hard work and consistency you can always achieve what you long for. I would suggest to start your preparation right now. Procrastination is never ending thing and tomorrow never comes. So buckle yourself up for this new journey, destination to which is really the most desired one.

I am not an authority to write about any subject because subject is totally subjective and relative thing. All the subjects are good and providing hundreds of results as well. Instead of searching good optional subject now aspirants of civil services are searching good guides, because the simplest subject can give negative result with an incompetent guide and toughest subject can produce positive result with a competent guide.

Wishing you good luck for coming examinations.

BEFORE STARTING YOUR PREPARATION...

An academic discipline that seeks knowledge based on reasoning

It is difficult to define the philosophy in precision, and the attempt to do so forms an interesting and important part of philosophy itself. If you go through the dictionary you will find that the term philosophy is derived from two Greek words – PHILOS & SOPHIA, means “The love for wisdom or knowledge.” Right from the early period the term philosophy has taken on something of this meaning. Philosophy is different from other subjects not only because it makes an attempt to discover the most general and fundamental underlying principles, but is also different in its method that can be described as rational reflection. So philosophy is actually similar to the simple act of thinking hard about something. Unlike the sciences, the philosophy does not discover new empirical facts, but instead reflects on the facts we are already familiar with. The philosophy differs from other subjects in being normative. By normative we mean that unlike other disciplines philosophy tries to distinguish, in very broad ways, what is from what ought to be.

But still in order to define the subject this question is to be answered that what is the subject matter of philosophy? Basically, any area of human concern can become the subject of philosophical interest. Originally philosophers were interested in everything, and much of what could now be classified as Physics, Zoology, Anthropology, Political science, Sociology and even Mathematics. In addition, the ancient Greek philosophers also were interested in the principles of reasoning, the nature of beauty in art, the principles that regulate human conduct, the standard for distinguishing just from unjust societies, and even the nature of reality itself.

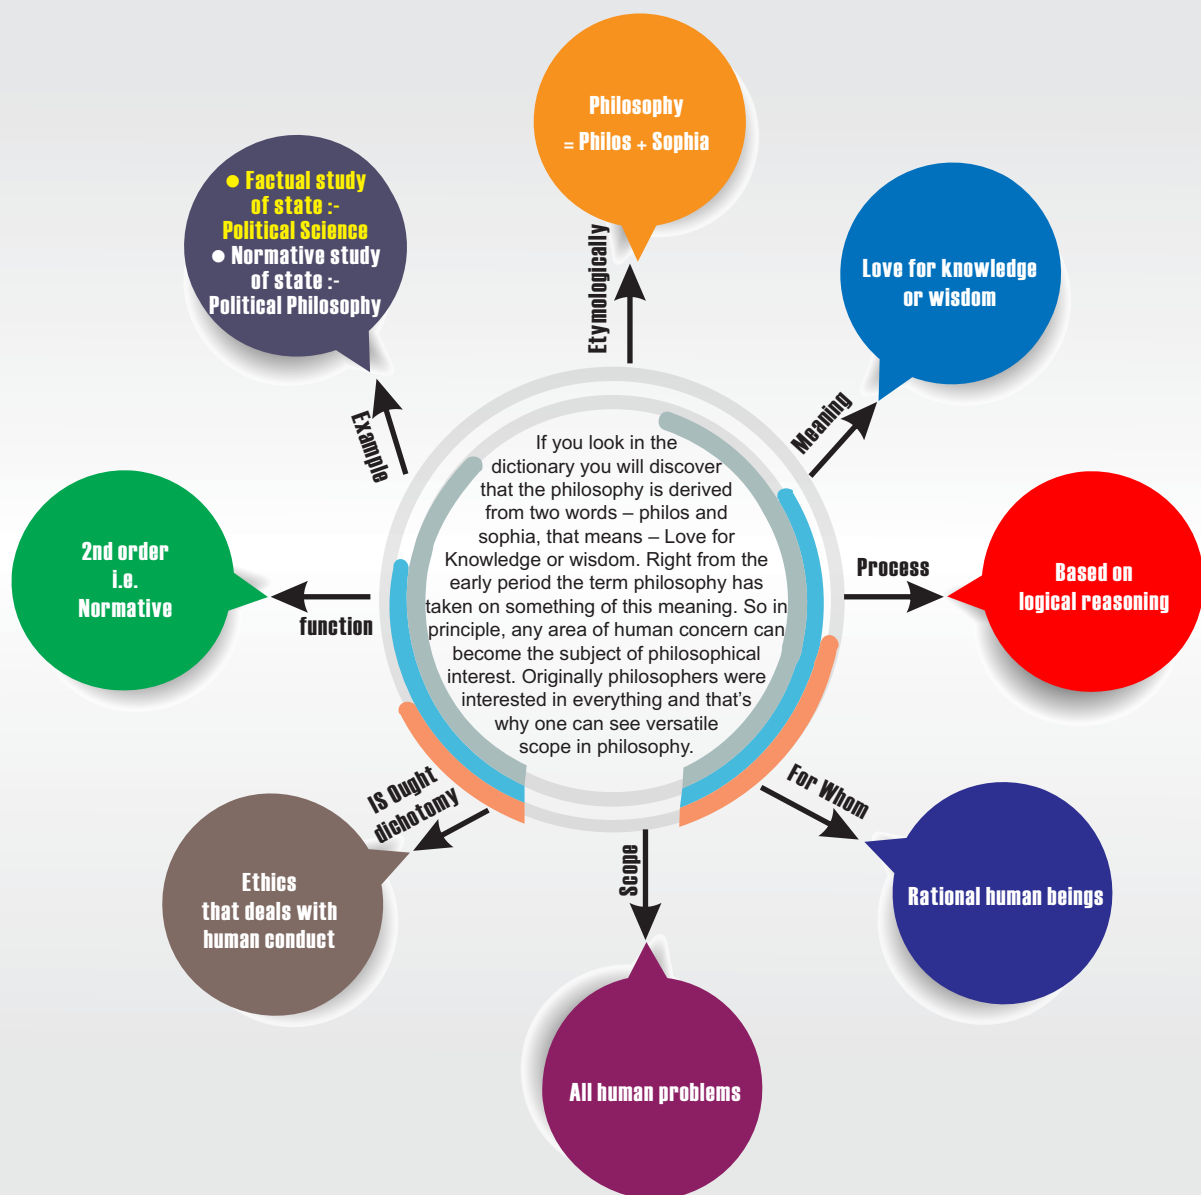

That's why today if you ask a philosopher who is concerned with the principles that should govern human actions, you might be told that ethics is the heart of philosophy. On the other hand, a philosopher who is fascinated by the nature and function of language might tell you that the most important task of philosophy is linguistic analysis that dispels the ambiguity and confusion. A political philosopher might insist that the really important task of philosophy is to discover the principles of social justice. Therefore we can say that the state of affair in philosophy is not so different from what you might find in physics. There are many different area investigated by physicists. Some are concerned with understanding atomic and subatomic reality. Others directed their attention outward to the exploration of space, and they would insist that astrophysics is the real subject matter of physics. Similarly each generation of thinkers raises its own questions and these may be in part brought to the surface by other events. For example, advances in medical science have forced the philosophers to deal with the wide range of bio-ethical issues. Environmental pollution and ecological imbalance have forced philosophers to think about environmental ethics and sustainable development.

Of the many matters with which philosophers concern themselves, it would be difficult to say that any one is the real task of philosophy, or that any one of the various questions dealt with by philosophers today is the most important, because what may be most important to you may not seem to be as important to someone else. This explains that why it is so difficult to come up with a single definition of philosophy that all philosophers would accept as completely adequate.

Best Wishes
